Read the passage carefully. Circle the eight incorrect words and write the correct words above them.

From where he stood in the park, Damian could see the roof of the apartment block in front of him. He ducked instinct when a shadow passed over the building, his breathing caught in his throat. Then he realised that he was not in Bosnia. He was back home in America and it was not a sniper who made the shadow on the rooftop. It was just a cloud moving across the sky. It had been half a year since Damian returned from Bosnia where he had reported in the battleground. Bombs went off constantly and people around him fell to the ground as he brought life coverage to millions all over the world. He had to keep his eyes no matter how frightened he was. Although he was well protected and he believed that the war would end one day, he never expected the events he witnessed to effect him so much. When he shut his eyes, he could still see the bloodshed. He could still hear the children crying and running for their lives. Through no wrong of his own, he was haunting by the events in the wartorn country.

From where he stood in the park, Damian could see the roof of the apartment block in front of him. He ducked instinctively instinct when a shadow passed over the building, his breath breathing caught in his throat. Then he realised that he was not in Bosnia. He was back home in America and it was not a sniper who made the shadow on the rooftop. It was just a cloud moving across the sky. It had been half a year since Damian returned from Bosnia where he had reported at in the battleground. Bombs went off constantly and people around him fell to the ground as he brought live life coverage to millions all over the world. He had to keep his head eyes no matter how frightened he was. Although he was well protected and he believed that the war would end one day, he never expected the events he witnessed to affect effect him so much. When he shut his eyes, he could still see the bloodshed. He could still hear the children crying and running for their lives. Through no fault wrong of his own, he was haunted haunting by the events in the wartorn country.
